BACKGROUND

HUMANS are perhaps the most variable of all the mortal races--in form, disposition, and prowess--making them difficult to summarize as a group. Inwardly, HUMANS have an intention toward good; Outwardly, however, HUMANS have a remarkable susceptibility to vice. To most other races, HUMANS are both allies and enemies; thus they are perceived as a generally neutral race. Most other races have learned to generalize HUMANS by their culture, and have learned not to be surprised by the incongruities, shifting allegiances, and erratic tenaciousness of men.
